Rachael Ray, host of the syndicated daytime series "Rachael Ray"

Kitchen closing: 'Rachael Ray' bids farewell to daytime TV

After 17 seasons of weekday food and fun, the kitchen is finally closing for "Rachael Ray."

That's the program that goes by that name, not the title personality, who is already looking toward new media horizons for herself.

The last episode of her syndicated talk show airs Wednesday, May 24, and it's sure to celebrate many of the top moments Ray has put forth over the better part of the past two decades — both as a culinary and lifestyle authority, and as someone whose interviewing skills have developed considerably during the show's run.

"I'm a good cook who learned how to talk to anybody over time," the ever-lively Ray says in assessing the longevity of her eponymous show, "and that's because of practice. I have always believed that anybody in America can be successful at anything if they can close their eyes and see themselves trying it. If you're not ashamed of where you come from, you never have to be ashamed of where you might go."

When "Rachael Ray" began in 2006, its bubbly host already was widely known for the cooking shows she made principally for Food Network, including "30 Minute Meals," a concept the former waitress and pub manager originated while she was a buyer for an upscale food market in Upstate New York. She parlayed that job into classes she taught to customers, which drew the interest of an area television station; the segments she did there paved the way for NBC's "Today" to feature her regularly, then for Food Network to begin showcasing her. Recurring spots on "The Oprah Winfrey Show" progressed to the point where Winfrey became an executive producer of Ray's own talk show from its inception.

Throughout the run of "Rachael Ray," the host has had a true partner in her husband, musician and lawyer John Cusimano. Besides contributing melodically to the program, he effectively became Ray's co-host when the coronavirus pandemic forced her to shift production from a Manhattan studio to the couple's home in Lake Luzerne, New York.

As for what lies ahead for Ray, she intends to work again with many of her "Rachael Ray" colleagues in channeling much of her focus and energy into her new venture, Free Food Studios. It has a commitment for an A&E series tentatively titled "Rachael Ray Meals in Minutes," the first effort in a new library of programming she intends to build with fellow producers she has worked with before. She also plans to nurture new talent in the food-show space.

"There's tons of great content out there, now more than ever," Ray reasons. "We're going to be working on platforms on multiple levels. The world is constantly changing in that way, and I feel so lucky as an American woman in her 50s to still be relevant. It's exciting and cool, and it proves the point that you can do anything you want."

Checking in with
DYLAN MCDERMOTT

Last year, "FBI: Most Wanted" got lucky, since the star it needed already was in executive producer Dick Wolf's employ.

As Julian McMahon's tenure on the CBS "FBI" spinoff was coming to an end, Dylan McDermott's stint on the Wolf-made NBC drama "Law & Order: Organized Crime" also was wrapping up. After McMahon's character Jess LaCroix died in the line of duty, McDermott stepped in as his successor, Remy Scott. In "Most Wanted's" fourth-season finale May 23, Scott gets a new chapter in his grief over his brother's death, since he gets fresh clues in the pursuit of the sibling's killer.

McDermott, whose daughter Colette recently appeared on "FBI: Most Wanted," recalls that he entered the show in an appropriate way ... with Scott meeting the other agents just as McDermott was meeting the other cast regulars. "I think that because these are professional people and these are agents, they know they have a job to do," McDermott reasons. "Yes, maybe they have feelings about who (Scott is) or where (he) came from, but I think that awkwardness really sort of diminishes."

It's now had more than a year for that, with the "FBI: Most Wanted" actors continuing to humanize their alter egos through personal situations including kidnappings and — in a recent cross-over with the other two "FBI" shows — experience with foreign crime rings. "I think we found that with Remy when we talked about (his) backstory," McDermott reasons. "I've used it several times already and hopefully, going forward, I'll continue to use it. It's a great thing to have.

"With other procedurals, a lot of these shows are people doing things because that's their job ... but with Remy, it's very personal, what he's doing. He's on a mission. He's on a quest."
