Bob Odenkirk brings 'Lucky Hank' to ornery life in AMC/AMC+ dramedy

Hank Devereaux Jr. is a man who is

As played by Bob Odenkirk in the half-hour dramedy "Lucky Hank," premiering Sunday, March 19, on AMC and AMC+, he's the chairman of the English department at Railton College, a badly underfunded school in the Pennsylvania Rust Belt.

Like his employer, which he calls "mediocrity's capital," Hank is also struggling. He's not really happy with academia nor his department and his position in it, and his do-nothing approach seems to scream "fire me." But he has people who care about him, especially wife Lily (Mireille Enos, "The Killing"), who truly loves this curmudgeon and is entertained by his antics. But that doesn't hold true for everyone.

We meet Hank as he's delivering a spirit-crushing critique to a spoiled student, which gets the attention of school administration. With his chairmanship and ultimately his job now in jeopardy, Hank appears outwardly happy about the prospect of being forced to move on. But is he?

The eight episode series was created by Paul Lieberstein ("The Office") and Aaron Zelman ("Silicon Valley") from the novel "Straight Man" by Richard Russo, and features a tour-de-force performance by Odenkirk, who found the character to be a complete and welcome departure from his "Better Call Saul" role of shady lawyer Jimmy McGill/Saul Goodman.

"While he's a curmudgeon," the actor explains, "he is like a lot of curmudgeons kind of beloved for the way he's a crab. Like his wife finds it funny, people find him funny. They don't take it seriously and they get a laugh out of it and he knows they get a laugh out of it, so he knows he can kind of indulge this crabby side of himself and everyone will just go, 'Oh, that's Hank. That's funny. Just laugh at it.'

"And he has a daughter, they fight like crazy but they love each other. And he has a wife, they've been together for like 25, 26 years and they love each other. So I loved playing a character who was funny, smart, good with language and had love around him and a life worth saving. So that really appealed to me an awful lot and for me made the character so fundamentally different from Jimmy McGill."

But like Jimmy, Hank is a complicated guy with an estrangement in his life, in his case his much more successful father Hank Sr., a renowned film critic, which haunts him and is a relationship the series will explore.

"There's an emptiness inside him that he's very afraid of," Odenkirk says, "afraid of feeling it, afraid of thinking about it but it's very present. It drives him in a lot of ways."

celebrity scoop

Six years after the events of "Death in Paradise," Kris Marshall returns to the role of Detective Inspector Humphrey Goodman in the spin-off crime drama "Beyond Paradise."

Currently streaming on BritBox, the series finds Humphrey out of the "Paradise" of the Caribbean and back on U.K. soil in the fictional southwest town of Shipton Abbott, where he's now engaged to Martha (cast returnee Sally Bretton) and is surrounded by a new team of police, including colleague Kelby (Dylan Llewellyn, "Derry Girls") and partner Esther (Zahra Ahmadi, "Doctor Who").

But life in this seaside burg isn't as sleepy as it seems and its unusually high crime rate puts Humphrey back to work on a new case in each episode.

For Marshall, stepping back into the character was a nobrainer and he found Humphrey's maturity six years on and his established relationship with Martha appealing as well.

"You know, they're a couple who found each other later in life," he explains, "and (it's about) the challenges they have to overcome and the personal journey they go on. You know, wanting to start a family and how to do that later on in life. But to me, it's the way we change the denouements as well, the denouements are completely different."

"I think it achieves that thing of like retaining the DNA and the interest of the original show, which is the lightheartedness and the puzzles," he continues. "But it's completely unique because it follows their personal relationships more closely."
